A Convicted Church—Part 2: Not content to sit and wait IN RURAL OKLAHOMA, CONGREGATION FINDS ITS CALLING IN PRISON MINISTRY.

For a little country congregation, the Fort Gibson Church of Christ is huge.

Its meeting place looms over a hillside in Oklahoma's oldest town — the site of a military outpost established in 1824. In 1855, J.J. Trott, a missionary from Tennessee, preached the Gospel here. A half-century later — yet still two years before Oklahoma became the 47th state — more than 300 people gathered for "The Big Meeting — Fort Gibson Indian Territory," a revival that birthed the church.

Now big-rig trucks speed eastward from the city of Muskogee on Highway 62, past a newly opened Cherokee casino and a sign that points to the church building on South Lee Street.

It's nearly as big as the casino, complete with circle drive, tall steeple and a lighted marquee sign that invites passers-by to visit. On Sundays, 350 to 400 people gather here for worship.

The church benefits from its location, said Budo Perry, one of the congregation's five elders. Though Fort Gibson boasts a mere 4,155 residents, according to census figures, the surrounding area has become a bedroom community for Muskogee, just across the Arkansas River, and Tulsa, about 45 minutes northwest on the Muskogee Turnpike.

The church could sit in its building and wait for worshipers to come. But for nearly three decades, the congregation's leaders have challenged members to take the Good News to people who need it desperately — the more than 25,000 prison inmates in Oklahoma.

Bob Young, who ministered for the church in the mid-1990s, helped introduce the members to New Life Behavior Ministries, a faith-based curriculum developed by H.M. Motsinger, a Church of Christ member and family therapist in Dallas. Using the Bible, the program tackles substance abuse and other demons that haunt inmates as it seeks to reconcile them with their families and their Creator. In recent years, Churches of Christ in Africa have launched affiliates of the Texas-based ministry.

In Fort Gibson, church members began teaching the curriculum at the Dr. Eddie Warrior Correctional Center, a minimum-security women's prison in Taft, 19 miles east of the church.

Twice per month, church members conduct Sunday worship at the prison. The church helped finance construction of a chapel for the inmates.

"Because of our participation, our members were involved in the design of the building," Perry said, "and that meant the builders included a baptistry."
